A FAMICOTT PUBLICATION

AMBUSH

By Walter Farner

THE ULLAL CROWD was laughing as the Boss River post office when Harbuck Green noticed Harbuck was a spare man of only average height. He wore rubber boots knee length with low heels. His faded overalls were washed out. Even the tin hat was a battered affair but his face was lined and healthy. Harbuck Green was forty-two years old.

He stopped over in the mail station—the post office was in one corner of the Boss River General Store—and asked: "Any mail for me? The mail? Green—Harbuck Green?"

Before postmaster Edie Peedy could reply a loud yarning voice called Red Whiskers had stopped between Green and the window night by pushing the mailer away with

"There's no mail here for me!" he growled. "And there are none here for me!"

Red Whiskers was dressed like a criminal. He wore a broad Russian embroidered, gaily colored, linen shirt high bodiced, spined full boots. He was dressed more as free like the other down men in the store. Green was only obviously the only lawer.

Harbuck Green had fought men and rifle and shot dead men and twice in shooting a living man from the end. When the government had opened up new lands in the west for settlers, he had not been afraid to move his family from the Buckeye State to the new wild frontier. He had never been scared of any man or anything, and he was not scared now.

"Stand aside," he said. "I am a citizen of the United States of America. I know my rights. It is my right to pick up my mail and I intend to do so!"

"I'll show you the only right you're entitled to!" retorted Red, as he swung his tin hat on Green's jaw. "The little man was possessed of better sense than the store where he worked against a free hand! He lay there for a constant, dead, shaking his head, trying to shake away the shadows so he could get back into the unscathed body."

But Red had no intention of trying to make a mistake. He had drawn one of his pistols and was pointing it at the farmer. "Get on your feet, now, and get out of here. You're not wanted. I give you just twenty-four hours to pack up your wife and your horse and head back where you came from. The only one here who stays in these parts are dead men!"

A tin came down hard on Red's gun and out went the pistol clattering. Another tin crashed against Red's jaw and sent him sprawling. As he lay on his back Red Whiskers exultantly went for his other gun but he found his fingers when he found himself staring into the barrel of a No. 42.

Clam Green, brother of the JJ Spotted field the 42 already. He decided "Red Whiskers yells, let speak with your face. You had no right to touch the little man down. Now you get out of town—quick!"

Red got to his feet and assembled for the door. It was dawn but he didn't want to tangle with Clam Green. His only show of spirit was to hurl the phrase "Mame love!" over his shoulder as he sprang to his saddle.

Harbuck Green had got up and walked toward the mail window. He said, "Thanks, mister," and held out his hand toward Clam Green. The man's fingers refused to shake.

"I hate snakes or men or anybody," he blurted. "This is snake country and you have one dead looking here!"

"But I don't understand," said Harbuck, puzzled. "How could you ride in this country?"

That's only because I like the hot play, growled the old lawman. "Can't stand to see a big body looking up a little one. Besides it's like you say. The government has opened up some land and happy for you farmers are."

that makes it legal. I stay the law. But that don't make them no law no more!"

Bitingly Harbush Green picked up his mail and departed. A few minutes later when the clock had started out grandmother Zerk Parry, keeping his while, "effers me a letter read." "Clear Good, you're a young man, but you're an old lawyer!"

Clear pressed good-naturedly at the old man. "Tall you, every winter, you know you're the only lawyer in the territory who can tell the cases and get away with it. What do you think of that?"

I mean you're against progress, and the progress! If this part of the country is ever going to amount to a hill of beans, there's got to be progress. Badlands replacing the stage coaches, telegraph lines instead of smoke signals—all that sort of thing. And there's got to be more people and there's got to be farms to feed the people. You ought to be welcoming the settlers instead of discouraging them. And believe me, boy, you're the leader in these parts. If you took a stand in front of the farmers, every settler in these parts would be on your side."

"There's too talk," Clear protested. "This is facts country and should remain so."

"Have it your way," said Back. "But think over what I said. And here's another thing to think over. Bad Whiskers is in your neck from the way you beat him out in front of everybody. Could he've done any more in the back of your head?"

But Clear did not have eyes in the back of his head. He was alone on the trail when the ugly voice called, "Take your hands or get a bullet in the back!"

He raised his hands and he recognized the voice of Bad Whiskers saying, "Take her guns, Back, while I keep him covered!" Here took the guns, then Clear was ordered to dismount. His hands were then behind him.

Bad Whiskers approached a shooting pit on his fire, looked glowering from his pig eyes

"Clear Good, I'm going to make you mighty sorry that you ever took a pig on me. I'm going to make your piggy back up to the ears even your ma won't recognize you!" Drawing back his fist he ordered, "Keep him covered! Back!"

There was a whizzing sound and Back felt not a hint of pain. He fell to the ground, clapping at his right eye. But Whiskers wheeled on his horse, the smoking footings and tried to draw his long handled spade cracked back against his head and sent him down and out.

Harbush Green jumped quickly to the right and left and returned him of his guns. Then he cut the rope binding Clear Good's wrists.

I don't carry a gun, he explained, so when I heard up the country I had to show the people that I was one—"he pointed at Back—and then I figured if I was lucky I could get you out with the smoke before he had a chance to shoot. I've got the brokenest heart. We can do them two up head him showed and take out to the sheriff. Better to me this so if they ought to be in jail for a while."

When they had had both men strapped up, Backling and loaded the gun on the back board. Clear turned to Harbush Green and groaned. "Master, please a real wheelbarrow to work plenty of average they you to take on a couple of hard men because like that arranged as you were. You sure saved my skin. He laid out his right hand toward the farmer."

Harbush Green kept his own hands at his sides. He told her you to keep your skin against a wheel," he said solemnly. "I didn't do you any favor. Just happens I know an lawyer."

FROM A SECOND Clear Good looked another time he felt into uncertainty but he kept his eyes on the dead to rights. But I don't to be your friend what you like it or not. And I am to see that you and all the other settlers get a square deal in these parts. A real square deal!"
